Red Riding Hood and the Well-fed Wolf

This video is a new twist on the old story. Red Riding Hood and her animated friends inform the wolf about nutrition and the food pyramid. Make sure students are familiar with the traditional tale before viewing the video. The teacher may want to plan a language arts lesson to compare/contrast the two versions.

Some factual statements from the video dialog include:

- The pyramid is arranged by the number of servings you ought to have each day.
- There are other things to eat besides meat.
- You need other things in your diet besides protein.
- Dairy products give you large quantities of vitamins and minerals.
- Some dairy products can be high in fat.
- Eating from only one food group is bad for you.
- They (vegetables) supply you with important vitamins like A and C that help you fight disease.
- The starchy vegetables like potatoes, winter squash, and corn give you carbohydrates for energy.
- Vegetables and fruits are the second level of the pyramid.

Some opinion statements from the video dialog include:

- You look like you got hit by a giant snitzelbonk.
- I like lamb, a little piglet, and maybe an occasional chicken.

- That sounds just perfect.
- I bet this will be the best meal you ever tasted.
- I guess I could use a good meal.
- I feel better already.
- I guess you've got a point there, Red.
- I think what you need is a good exercise program.
